

I do not believe... there is enough privacy for individuals to conduct business and personal cell phone conversations during flights. I feel without the options to take my person to an area where I do not have to listen to their business conversations then there should be no allowance for conducting that business. As it is, airlines are flying full capacity with high noise levels (decibels?) due to conversations, crying babies, engine noise, etc. adding cell phones will increase that level, introducing to single passengers the option to talk endless thru out the flight. (Check out the airport waiting area for those loudly talking in line). Not only annoying, it's a violation of my privacy! Given the right to use his cell phone, why would an annoying passenger, upon my request to please end the conversation, do so? If he knew how annoying it was he would not make the call in the first place. Once smokers were allowed to smoke in their space and yours, including in an airplane; now there are limits and heavy restrictions. I don't think the dangers are necessarily the same but the comparison illustrates the shared space issues and concerns with cell phone usage. All the passengers choosing to travel by air, already have in flight options, for conducting business use PCs, for music pleasure use headsets, reading and sleeping both require a degree of low noise levels as does relaxing. Why permit more noise and add to individual stress levels?????? Please consider a novote on this issue. Thank you.
